Lying as Hemingway's Way to Protect the Truth Katja de Winter
Ernest Hemingway lead an adventurous life; he took part in five different wars (either as ambulance driver or as war correspondent), was married four times, went on safaris to do big-game hunting, enjoyed high-sea fishing and bullfighting, lived in Paris and Cuba as an expatriate, won the Nobel Prize and finally committed suicide. Harold Bloom is certainly not exaggerating when he calls this ‘an absurdly implausible life, apparently lived in imitation of Hemingway’s own fiction’.

Many readers prefer to see it the other way round, however, and believe that Hemingway’s fiction mirrors the experiences he went through himself. A closer look at his work – including journalistic pieces, fiction and non-fiction – reveals that both viewpoints contain a grain of truth.

At the same time, however, this is one of the major difficulties one encounters when reading Hemingway: the conception of “truth”. Although this seems a simple and straightforward term, Hemingway’s idea of “truth” differs from ours so much that he can be lying while telling the truth.
