A Family Rift Anatomised: 21st Century Fostering. Brown Play-Doh Happens. Deal With It. David Waugh, Laurel Waugh
All children taken into the care system are damaged. The extent and pace of their recovery is dependent on the quality of 1) social workers 2) the pool of carers and adopters available 3) environmental factors and 4) the limit upon the child through inherent or acquired conditions.

A significant number of the young people coming into care will be suffering to a greater or lesser degree from the mother drinking in planned or unplanned pregnancy, deliberately or unknowingly. Brain damage that is irreversible could blight that human being for life, the social costs are not insignificant, and people concerned directly or indirectly battle heartache and hard work amongst a range of consequences on a daily basis.

Foster carers and adopters face the burden of family rifts from the bringing of strangers into their world. A range of jealousies and misunderstandings get writ large.

This is a true story of the failure over 10 years of the NHS to provide a diagnosis for a severely damaged young man first fostered then adopted, a family member who did not understand the individual or our difficulty in bringing him up and then the occurrence of a perfect storm resulting in a family rift together with an allegation to authorities resulting in a lengthy investigation.

This our story. It could be other people's!
